Creating egalitarian metropolitan spaces

Monday 02/07/2018

Last Monday a conference was held in Brussels to present the Metropolis Observatory's fourth issue paper: “Egalitarian metropolitan spaces”. The paper was written by Ana Falú, the coordinator of UN Habitat's Gender Hub, and sparks a debate on how public policies need to incorporate a gender perspective on a metropolitan scale.

The event was co-organised by the Brussels-Capital Region and held at the headquarters of the European Committee of the Regions. Jean-Luc Vanraes, the political representative for the Government of the Brussels-Capital Region, and Laura Pérez, Councillor for Feminism and LGTBI at Barcelona City Council, were the opening speakers at the event.

After the inaugural speeches the author presented the issue paper, which was followed by an interesting dialogue between Ana Falú and Laura Pérez, who spoke about the need to continue merging urban policies with gender policies. While discussing the issue paper, they pointed out the added value of incorporating a gender perspective across global agendas, as this is "not just as a tool to analyse urban policies from a gender perspective, but goes one step further and tries to bring this perspective to a wider scale across metropolitan spaces". In addition, Laura made it clear that this perspective cannot be incorporated from any one department, and must instead be fully mainstreamed so that it is part of absolutely every metropolitan policy, building truly "intersectional policies".

One of the round tables held during the event was set up so that Metropolis members could present and share their experiences in creating urban projects with a gender perspective. Representatives from Barcelona City Council, the Government of Brussels-Capital, the Municipality of Montevideo and the Greater Municipality of Amman all presented case studies. Each project showed a different aspect involved in implementing policies with a gender perspective:

- Representatives from Brussels talked about their regional bicycle mobility plan, with the aim of recovering public space after the terror attacks and ensuring that these spaces are safe and easy to travel through, to increase the number of women who use them.
- Meanwhile, delegates from Barcelona gave a presentation on the participatory process involved in setting the priorities for reforming one of the city's main roads. The gender perspective was incorporated at all times during the process, either when encouraging citizen involvement or when introducing proposals in the project.
- Representatives from Amman introduced and talked about a number of projects focused on mobility and reforming the public space.
- Delegates from Montevideo spoke about their equality plan, which aims to ensure the entire administrative structure incorporates a gender perspective by drafting intersectional and inclusive policies.

The presentations given by Metropolis members were further enriched by contributions from experts from very different backgrounds. On the one hand, the event was attended by Cities Alliance representative Laura Lima. On the other hand, Soon-Young Yoon, president of WEDO (Women's Environment and Development Organization) offered a perspective from an international women's organisation. Lucile Biarrotte, who holds a PhD in urban planning from Lab'Urba at The University of Paris-Est, offered an academic perspective. Last but not least, a multi-faceted point of view was provided by Holliki Voolma, member of the gender equality group at the Court of Justice of the European Union. This round table featured four recurrent and cross-cutting aspects: creating a data bank; cross-cutting work between different departments via trained staff and therefore implicitly offering training to teams; and finally making a budget commitment so that these policies can be properly executed.

The conference was brought to a close by Valeri Rajkovcevic, Cabinet Adviser to the Secretary of State for Equal Opportunities in the Brussels-Capital Region, and Metropolis Secretary General Octavi de la Varga, who reiterated the association's commitment to promoting fairer and more inclusive metropolises by incorporating a gender perspective in public policies.
