It is important to restore trust in public transport, while better communicating its collective benefits.

Cities need to discuss how authorities can play a stronger role in ensuring public transport is the backbone of mobility services.

Continued political leadership is needed to innovate in urban mobility.

Urban spaces must be rethought to integrate new mobility patterns emerging in cities.

Informal transport must be regulated so it can be integrated as another urban mobility option on offer.

An integrated urban mobility approach must be developed in order to fully consider its impact on every aspect of urban quality of life.

Intermodality should be promoted in order to respond to new mobility demands: integrating emerging modes of transport and encouraging public transportation.

The emergence of new working and living habits will change the distribution of mobility flows.

We urgently need to limit the use of private cars, promote the benefits of public transport and include more sustainable mobility models.
